The future form is based on a form of the verb stem called the second principal part. The form of the verb stem already presented, and used in the present and imperfect tenses, is called the first principal part. For the verbs we have studied, the second principal part is formed by adding a sigma to the verb stem. When the verb stem ends with a consonant, it may combine with the added sigma. Thus, verb stems ending in β, π, or φ in the first principal part have ψ in the second principal part. Verb stems ending in κ or ττ in the first principal part have ξ in the second principal part. (Notice, however, that πρᾶττω is an exception, with σ in the future.)

The future tense uses the same endings as the present tense, and will show the same accentuation as the present.

The future tense expresses an action to occur in the future. It is translated in English as will do; for example, λύσω = I will release, γράψω = I will write. Notice that one Greek word is translated by a phrase in English.

The future tense of εἶμι is translated will be, and is used only to identify, describe, or locate its subject.
